Dikran Toumajian, who teaches the Armenian language in classes at Ten Mile Community School, expands the sessions to include high school seniors and adults who wish to learn the language, as well as the culture of that country.

The new evening sessions begin April 4 and will run for eight consecutive Wednesdays from 7 to 9 p.m. in the school on Ten Mile Road, east of Farmington Hills.

Currently he teaches younger children, in the Farmington site, in an enrichment course during after-school hours. The new class is another of his efforts to preserve Armenian culture to the American-born generation.

One of the ethnic revivals of all cultures in America includes the 30,000 Armenian people in the metropolitan area who live primarily in the Farmington Hills, Southfield and Dearborn communities.

In addition to the study of the language, Toumajian will include sessions on the past and present history, and geography of the land that once was an independent country, but now one of the 15 republics in the Soviet Union.

classes can't be added to the schedule. Both teachers use "Armenian Made Easy," a textbook published by the Alex Manoukian Cultural Fund.

Registration for all classes offered by the Alex Manoukian Cultural Fund is continuing to end about the week of April 4. Inquiries will be taken in the spring term begin by calling the school, 444
