

This type of delivery truck — familiar to so many persons over the years — is quickly becoming a relic of the past. (Staff photo)

Grimm delivers milk, helps friends and out of his truck and walking between the vehicle and customers' homes will get him down. Sometimes he thinks of joining the other milkmen he knew who have given up the business.

"I tried to think of something else I would like to do but I can't think of anything I would like as much as this," he said.

The job has helped him raise a family of three daughters and one son and to see them through high school.

Now with four grandchildren added to the family, Grimm still makes his first run to the schools at 7 a.m. after picking up the order at 4:45 a.m.

Sticking to the job is one of the key requirements in the business. If a milkman is persistent and works 12 months a year, he can make between $15,000-$20,000, according to Grimm.

"IT'S A GOOD healthy job. You get a lot of fresh air and you're selling a clean healthy product," he said.

But Grimm earns enough health and exercise on the job. Watching a jogger run through a subdivision, Grimm observed, "What a waste of time and energy."
