m.m.memos

Something our whole family much enjoys is reading, but sometimes I think we like rereading even more.

That realization has hit me as we have been sorting out hundreds of books while getting ready for a new home.

The man of our house has a tremendous appetite for books and late evening hours to indulge it, so, though he makes regular trips to the library, it's not unusual for him to run out of new material and turn back to a book enjoyed before.

And the rest of us also like to go back for reacquaintance. I just finished rereading one of my all-time favorites, Herman Wouk's "The Winds of War," because I wanted to be ready to take on his new one, "War and Remembrance," later in the summer. And the girls have been known to reread an old favorite dog-eared before.

In the last few weeks I've been looking over many shelves of books needing decisions about whether they would stay with us.

A lot of occupants of those shelves were like pasters-by, books noted by me as others read them. I passed on decisions on those.

Others I thought of as casual acquaintances — I've run through them and enjoyed the action but I don't think I'll return to them. These probably will appear on local organizations' book sale tables.

But the shelves also contain a few real friends, books to be read and reread because they get better each time. Without a doubt, these remain members of the family.

Sorting out books was one of the big projects for our college daughter when she came home last weekend to clean her room.

When she had finished, I noticed that the box of discarded, contained frayed copies of two of her great favorites, Anna Seton's "Green Darkness" and Wouk's "Marjorie Morningstar."

"You're really leaving girlhood if you are giving up those two," I remarked to her.

"Who says I'm giving them up?" she came back. "I can't read those because the pages are falling out, but I can always get another copy or go to the library when I want to read them again."

Old friends are persistent, even when they live on bookshelves.
