Boxes still are stacked high, and I'm still carrying around other boxes. But they are mostly empty now, their contents stowed in new resting places.

Furniture has been 'distributed, though arrangements still need a little

First there were the chairs, tables, chests and appliances that had been in storage for two weeks while we waited impatiently for the house to be vacated for us. The shortage of diesel fuel caused us to wait an extra nine hours, but before dusk, the van had come and before dark, it had departed.

Then, just as we started finding spots for the furniture brought by the movers, the boxes started arriving by the score. All cars in the family were turned into transporters for the packed boxes stored in our daughter's base-though arrangements still need a little reconsiderating. Necessities of living, like forks and spoons and washer and drier, are in place and inuse. Only a few items were missing, and at this writing all have been located. After several weeks of feeling like wanderers and migrants and displaced persons, were at last practically at home in our new home. For our clan, the big move came in waves of furnishings pouring into the new quarters. First there were the chairs, tables, feetst and appliances that had been in ment. We high-slepped over the mountains of containers, trying to dig out the one to be unpacked next. And then, as we started gaining on the great mass, I engineered in the third wave, a van load of furnishings from my aunt's home. We never can catch up, we just keep bringing in more," my hard-working daughters told me.

But catch up we did, and as we unpacked, we all agreed the job was made easier with that sparking pool ready for jumping-in purposes. A little like unpacking suitcases at a vacation spot, we decided.

Settling in is nearly complete; mak-ing the house our home is more than well begun. And I have until the end of this week to complete the emptying of my aunt's house.

And then I won't mind a bit if I never see another packing box.
