see her there in the dim light bending forward and listening, a stender girlish figure. Then the outer door crashed open, letting in a flood of light from without, and a step sounded heavity on the floor. The young woman straightened up, the clear profile of her face ingression. Somehow shelpy knew she had braced herself for the cornest. Macklin must have stopped just within the door, saturing about him the door, saturing a step forward, "is that the name of the indian you left on guard?"

He gazed at her open-mouthed, for the moment too astooished to even find speech.

"What?" he stammered finally, "why, what are you doing out here? Who opeed that door? Where is the d-d red langke, anyway?"

"I do not know 'very much more than you, do," she replied quietly. "There was a fight of the door, "" white man, and the guard. They were both killed."

"Both—both killed." he seemed unable to grasp the fact. "Who was the white man?"

"I do dook know."

"And you did not even run away? Did not it yo escape?" she caked "what was there turn me to do but wait with the man, and the guard. When the man and the guard.
