All in a Day's Work

His gun held ready, his eyes glancing about eagerly, a man in hunter's garb moved silently through a North Michigan swamp. Suddenly the beat of flapping wings sounded. Quickly raising gun to shoulder, he fired. "A miss!" he growled disappointedly as the duck rose high into the air and disappeared from view. But—had the duck hunter missed?

Called from his bed that night (it was raining) one of the repair men went out to investigate the trouble. Following the toll lead, he drove more than a score of miles in the darkness and rain and tramped additional miles through a swamp. Using a flashlight, he finally found the source of the trouble—an insulator that had been shot off.

In a telephone booth in a hotel 30 miles distant, that same evening, a brisk, alert-looking business man put in a call for Detroit. Ordinarily, ten minutes would suffice for the connection. The business man waited. Finally, with the explanation that the delay was due to poor transmission, the operator announced that Detroit was on the line. The operator then immediately notified the Repair Department of line trouble.

Interruptions in telephone service, we repeat, may be due to a thousand and one causes. The foregoing is a statement of an actual incident. A thousand similar stories could be written. The point is just this: Through all such difficulties, night and day, regardless of weather conditions, the people of the Telephone Company are doing their duty to the public by being constantly on the job to keep service up to its high standard.
