ALL SUBSERVIENT TO MAN

Process of Domestication of Wild Animals From Earliest Ages is Interesting Study.

Man gained the dog by domesticating the jackal and different species of wolves, in different parts of the world and then by crossing or, by a more or less unconscious selection bred different varieties, until we have at present a class of intermingled breeds. Something similar but on a smaller scale was true of the domestic cattle, according to "The New Stone Age in Northern Europe," by John M. Tyler. One kind of domestic cattle appears fully domesticated in the oldest lake dwelling. It is unlike any wild European form. This is the Bos brachyceros. It was almost certainly imported. Mingled with its forms we find those of the Bos primigenius, a native of Europe and north Asia, but apparently not domesticated. This is the urus, which was common in Europe in Caesar's day, and lasted in central Europe until 3000 A. D., and still lingers in Poland. This was a very large and powerful form with long spreading horns whose domestication appears to have commenced toward the close of the Neolithic period. It is not improbable that it was domesticated, or at least tamed, independently in different countries at quite different times. Raising of cattle was at its height during the bronze age; afterward the results seem to decline and the cattle to degenerate.

It is only a matter of time until the man with the borrowing habit runs out of friends.

The man who thinks the world is growing worse imagines himself to be growing better.

Aluminum Ware Saves Fuel

Women who have aluminum tea kettles in their kitchens know that they bring water to the boiling point quickly and require only a small amount of heat to keep the water hot, thus saving fuel.

Aluminum cooking utensils are the most economical in the long run. They do not crack or chip; they save you the expense of constantly buying new utensils.

Aluminum utensils are silver-like in their shining beauty—a constant source of pride to the woman who owns them.
