Schools lack psychologists

There is a critical shortage of school psychologists in out-state Michigan because fewer university students have been enrolling in this field, says a professor of educational psychology at Michigan State University.

Dr. Harvey Clarizio reports that MSU's College of Education would like to see more persons consider school psychology as a career. Placement opportunities for either bachelor's or master's level graduates are excellent, he notes.

Potential students should contact Dr. Clarizio, Department of Counseling and Educational Psychology, College of Education, Michigan State University, East Lansing 48824.
