

Datsun 1980 210

A major facelift and the addition of a sports luxury package mark 1980 1/2 revisions for the 210, Datsun's most economical model. The new 210, which comes in five models, has a redesigned exterior including rectangular headlights, wider appearing bumpers, new taillights and a horizontal bar grille.

It's illegal, too

Changing controls can be expensive

Car owners who alter their car's emission-control system in the hope of getting better gasoline mileage are warned that it can add to their expenses. It's also illegal.

The Automotive Information Council points out that tampering can reduce the efficiency of the engine system by upsetting the balance of the elements. Result: lessened fuel economy and poorer performance.

In addition, at trade-in time, a dealer might deduct the cost of restoring the emission devices in order for him to sell the car within Environmental Protection Agency regulations.

Tampering also could void warranty coverage of the engine and its components. And tampering will add to air pollution. Drivers are warned not to substitute leaded fuel in cars which require non-leaded gasoline because it can clog and ruin the expensive catalytic converter.

Enlarging the gas filler neck to allow use of leaded gasoline is considered tampering, as is use of a non-certified carburetor.

Emission control is part of the total design and function of the engine, including the carburetor, distributor, fuel pump, manifold and others. If one of these is altered, it likely will affect the others, usually adversely.

The EPA considers tampering as removing, disconnecting, damaging or in any way rendering ineffective any emission-control device or element of design installed on a vehicle. These include the engine items mentioned, plus the catalytic converter, air pump, vacuum lines and others.

For maximum operating efficiency and economy, the Automotive Information Council urges drivers to follow common-sense driving habits and to follow the maintenance schedule outlined in the owner's manual.
