Inns play large part in Farmington past

sight of the first post office. It is located at 23929 and 23927 Farmington Road. It is a mixture of farm colonial and classic design.

It's time for lunch, so head on down to 28000 Grand River, the Botsford Inn. It has been a mecca for travelers since 1836. It is the oldest operating inn in the state and was a stop on the stage coach route from Detroit to Lansing. A treasure house for those whose appetites are whetted by antiques, a lot of charm and good food.

The Farmington Historical Commission has installed markers on many of the homes mentioned plus other sites of special significance.

The same type of project is being carried out in Farmington Hills.

The drive through Farmington Hills is less rigid. There are two homes on Power which runs north from Grand River, between Orchard Lake and Farmington. It jogs to the right at Shilwassee.

The home at 24770 Power, between Ten and Eleven Mile, was built in 1850. It has some Greek Revival characteristics.

It originally contained 22 rooms, but at some time in the past a north wing burned and the basement foundation was rediscovered during excavation for a home on the north lot.

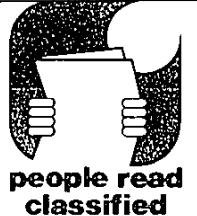

There is a full Michigan basement under the home and each stone is carefully split to provide a flat inside surface. The huge, hand hewn attic beams are pegged, cut and slipped through each other.

The home stands on land which was part of the original tract belonging to Farmington founder Arthur Power. On the northwest corner of Power and Eleven Mile is a white-columned home that was once the Philbrick Tavern.

It is said the tavern, under Quaker ownership, was a stop on the Underground Railway.
