

Ice age returns in new exhibit

Across the street from the State Capitol, students can get a special taste of the state's history that takes them from the present back to the glacial ages.

Michigan history "comes alive" in a display at the Michigan Historical Museum's new location at 208 N. Capitol Ave. in Lansing. A chronological arrangement of photographs, artifacts and drawings takes visitors from the present back through the state's history.

The display covers the development of the automobile, the logging, pharmaceutical, furniture and breakfast food industries, the Civil War, the American Revolution, fur trappers, French voyageurs, the British, Indians and early settlers in Michigan. These are all represented by photographs and artifacts.

In a special display, students can test their ability on an early 1900s typewriter and other household items of the times.

The state has a bank of more than 30,000 artifacts; the exhibits are rotated periodically. In addition to the historical display, every half hour a slide-tape show entitled "The Promise That is Michigan" is shown in the museum's 60-seat theater.

The museum is operated by the History Division of the Department of State and is open from 9:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and from noon to 4:30 p.m. Saturday and Sunday. Admission is free.

Fish stories date back a long way

It's interesting to study primitive fishing methods and compare them to modern techniques. Surprisingly, there isn't much difference.

Consider the hook. Early man fashioned his hook from stone, bone or wood. We call it a gorge, after its purpose.

The gorge is shaped like a needle, sharp at both ends, but fat in the middle. A hole drilled through the thickest part held the line, usually made of slender vines.

Bait was placed on the gorge so that it paralleled the line. When a fish swallowed the bait, pulling the line freed the gorge which stuck crossways in the fish's bullet.

Nets are not a new method. Archaeologists find impressions of them in long-buried sites, plus the drilled stones used as weights to hold the nets in position in the water.

Two ancient techniques still followed by anglers are spearing and noodling. Instead of a stone spear, the modern fisherman has a multi-pronged metal gig.

This is a popular method for taking "rough" fish from clear streams and lakes and is legal in most states.

Noodling is usually illegal because it causes the loss of large breeding fish.

The noodler works underwater, finding a catfish on its nest and soothing the fish while preparing to lift it from the water.

Fish traps, wires and poison are common methods used today which have not changed for many thousands of years.
