

The trend toward holistic medicine

Thursday, September 18, 1980

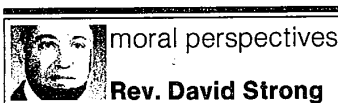

(S.R. 6B, F-14B)(O)9B

The Chinese consider that there are five levels of medical healing. The highest level, above that of the surgeon, is the wiseman who teaches the laws of the universe. He is the only one who is considered to effect a genuine cure since he goes to the heart of the problem of disease, the patient's inability to live in harmony with the universe.

Some might consider this a bit of trivia, others an important theme of life. It comes out of a new book, "Health for the Whole Person," which suggests the vast expansion of directions and views concerning holistic medicine.

IT IS MY observation that most of the professionals in health care do not know what to do with attitudes and practices which are not strictly in the scientific realm. Yet as time passes we will see more and more emphasis upon diet, environment, emotional and spiritual attitudes in relation to health and healing.

Two areas in which a more holistic health approach has developed more rapidly are death and dying and cancer treatment.

moral perspectives

Rev. David Strong

Clergy and church organizations have committed themselves to ministry in these areas. Other religious organizations attract people through their interest in holistic health. What we may anticipate is that in-

Institute sponsors trip

"The Bronze Age of China," an exhibition that represents the most important, recent archeological discovery in China, is the focus of a weekend field trip to Chicago Oct. 17-19, sponsored by the Cranbrook Institute of Science.

The exhibition at the Field Museum of Natural History includes eight life-sized, baked clay figures from an army of 7,500 soldiers and horses assembled to protect the tomb of the First Emperor of Qin more than 2,000 years ago. Discovery of the tomb and its terra cotta army is considered the most important archeological find in China in recent times.

Included in the exhibition are almost 100 bronze and jade pieces representing China's bronze era, 1,300 B.C. to 206 B.C.

Fee of $103.50 includes double occupancy at the Conrad Hilton, round trip bus fare, a box lunch, entrance fees to the Field Museum and a $20 tax-deductible donation to Cranbrook Institute of Science.

creasingly people will make unique demands upon our medical-care delivery systems so that they might be more responsive to a holistic approach.

THERE WILL be a conflict of two approaches because people will wish to be serviced by the experts and the latest technology.

The concept of holistic health, on the other hand, wishes to return much of the responsibility for health and healing to the patient. Will our general society be willing to accept such responsibilities?

Will people learn to meditate in place of popping pills? Will we examine our individual and social values relating to health?

Will religious institutions teach values and views of the world which contribute to health?

The increasing involvement of religious groups and leaders with the realm of medicine and health is a good sign. We all know all along that religion and health are related. The question is how to prepare for and legitimize an increasingly closer relationship.
