A Lotus Esprit Turbo will be featured in the newest James Bond movie 'For Your Eyes Only.' The 150-mile-per-hour luxury sports car is actually three cars. All three look alike, but one is only a shell so it can be destroyed at minimum expense.

Cars and comments

Big car may be best buy

Your best buy in a 1981 automobile might be (of all things) a big car.

There are two main reasons for that view, according to the Automotive Information Council.

1. The larger cars have been given lower percentage price increases than their smaller brothers because of the higher popularity of the small cars. For the same reason, dealers will give better discounts on the big cars.

2. The larger cars have received big gains in fuel efficiency this year. The 10-mpg gas hog has just about disappeared. Even the larger cars that pointedly do not advertise gasoline mileage are far better than they were a few years ago.

But the smaller cars give better fuel economy, you might argue. True, but the savings will be less than in the past years because of the improvements in gasoline economy for the bigger ones.

Fuel improvement for many full-size and intermediate cars has doubled when compared with their 1972 counterparts, while gains for small cars have been about half that. The mileage difference, therefore, has been changed.

For example, if a driver covers the average 12,000 miles per year with a 30-miles-per-gallon subcompact, the annual gasoline expenditure would be $500 (at $1.25 per gallon.)

The owner of a large 22-miles-per-gallon car would spend $681, or a difference of $181 for the year.

Therefore, there is more than gasoline economy to be weighed when considering a new car. Think about how many people the car will carry and how often, the luggage space and the purchase price. These all must be weighed before making the final decision.

If you want a high-mileage car, buy one. But even with the cost of gasoline going up, the difference may not be what it seems.
