

Audience laughs, cries at 'Owl, Pussycat'

By R.S. LEIDER

review

You may say it's a story about a smart bookworm and a not-so-smart hooker. Actually, that's only the surface. The intelligent fella knows only from the written page, no common sense and his apparent nemesis is well, dumb, like a fox. They fight each other, learn from each other and finally they love each other. In the meantime, the audience laughs and cries with Felix and Doris. "The Owl and the Pussycat" in the Theatre of the Arts current offering in dinner theater at Mr. Mac's Stables.

It will play through Dec. 27 at this Machus restaurant in the Fairlane Park Towers in Dearborn. This witty and heartwarming two-character play by Bill Manhoff brings together two of the most unlikely bedfellows ever to meet in the brownstones of New York City. Previous to this play's actual beginning, Felix Sherman, a relatively unsuccessful writer, has been watching Doris' money-making activities from his apartment window. He informs her landlord and she is thrown out. At start, Doris with television set, meager belongings and suitcase in hand pounds on the Sherman apartment door, gains access and emphatically reports to Felix that she is moving in. WHAT FOLLOWS is the development of the story relationship. Perhaps the story is racy at times, but director Kat La Rose handles the material with skill. The audience consistently enjoys and identifies, but is never offended or bored. The players are constantly on the move and entertaining. Del Howison, ever versatile in his role of the owl, moves the character from tepid timidity to unsavory business. His only fault is that he does not carry the voice he starts off with through to the end.

As the pussycat, Beth Carpenter is tough and sexy. She gives us a character that grows and falls and tries again. We see Doris' pain and the hard edge of her personality that we know will eventually force her to succeed. The preplay portion of the evening is equally delightful. "The Machus" meal is delicious and well-served with many tempting choices of entrees.
