A new era in Farmington Hills began this week when newly elected and re-elected council persons took the oath of office. Participating in the ceremony in council chambers were (from left) councilmembers

Charles Williams, Jan Dolan, Fred Hughes and Joann Soronen. Giving the oath is City Clerk Floyd Cairns.

INCREASING CITIZEN access to city government, however, is the accomplishment Wolf considers most significant.

"Our staff held what you could call 'town hall meetings' where we listened to the people and made their concerns our concerns," Wolf said. "People have realized a sense of ownership about their city. It was a complete turnaround that I think will be receiving national recognition soon."

Wolf added he is "thankful that Farmington Hills has not been as dependent on the Washington bailout system as other local governments."

"The days of Washington handouts are over," he said. "But it's time the gravy-train type of government that has nearly ruined this country came to an end."

More power is being handed from the state to local government, "which is what new federalism is all about," Wolf added.

"With more local responsibility, this Council will have tough decisions to make. We'll have to find workable alternatives to federal funds."

A PARTICULAR alternative Wolf espouses concerns the non-profit Neighborhood Housing Services Program which grants low interest, long-term loans for residential renovation to low-income homeowners.

He urged both the Council and new mayor to allow him to further pursue that area as well as his plan to earmark revenue from cable TV for particular community projects.
