ones we most certainly would like to win.

"A lot of people think the 15th (district) can be won (by a Republican). John is an aggressive, energetic, issue-oriented candidate. We feel Faxon has some vulnerable areas such as his vote to increase the state income tax. The state's mispending priorities of the past came from a Democrat-controlled Legislature," Ashley added.

Anderson contends the No. 1 issue in Michigan is the economic climate, which translates to jobs and business development.

"It's the heart of what this election is all about," he said.

"To encourage jobs we need to abolish the single business tax, which bears no relation to profits and is a disincentive for employers, and to reform workers' and unemployment compensation. It's a matter of survival."

"The more people know about Faxon, the less they're going to like him, added the 31-year-old Anderson.

"We're going to turn the floodlights on him and show that he's a Detroit liberal whose views are not at all consistent with those of the people of this district."

To win the Senate seat, Anderson estimates he'll have to spend $50,000 to $75,000.

"Actually, it was kind of nice not having anything there for a while," said Lad Guest, who owns two homes that abut the restaurant, "but I like to see the community thriving."

Guest said he and his neighbors are glad to see the restaurant has been taken over by the Ram's Horn company because company officials "seem well-intentioned."

However, says Guest, persons living in the area remember all too well being awakened by squeals from the cars and mouths of patrons of the Landmark.
