Chimney sweep keeps you one flue up on rest

The heatbreak and expense of fire could result from a chimney coated with creosote, the condensed wood smoke which adheres to chimney walls. The highly flammable material creates dangerous burning debris and sparks which shoot out of a chimney and may set a house ablaze.

Creosote accumulation is often caused by burning large loads of wood in an enclosed space. Smaller fires with plenty of air slow down the rate of accumulation. Although you have to add wood more often to smaller fires, the total amount of wood burned and the heat produced will be about the same.

To inspect for creosote accumulation, look for a sticky black build-up on the walls by peering down the chimney from the rooftop and up the chimney from inside during daylight hours.

If creosote has a hard tar glaze, a deposit only one-quarter inch thick can fuel a substantial chimney fire. If you see what you believe to be a creosote deposit, call a chimney sweep.

Chimney sweeps, like any other service professionals, know their business better than the average do-it-yourselfer. They can clean more thoroughly, in a shorter period of time, than can most professionals. Don't play with fire. Inspect your chimney and call a chimney sweep if necessary.
