New booklet on mental retardation available

Who are the nation's mentally retarded citizens?

Where do they live?

How many American families are affected by mental retardation?

This and other related information is included in "The Prevalence of Mental Retardation" an Association for Retarded Citizens (ARC) adaption of Robert P. Ingalls' "Mental Retardation: The Changing Outlook."

A summary of the best prevalence studies available indicates that two and one half to three percent of the general population is mentally retarded. Based on 1980 census figures, that estimate ranges from 5.6 to 6.7 million Americans.

The prevalence of mental retardation is exceeded only by four other major health problems: mental illness, heart diseases, arthritis and cancer.

Included in the booklet are major areas of prevalence. Among these are male-female ratios, age differences and socio-economic factors. The latter is of primary importance since researchers have determined a relationship between poverty and mental retardation.

The booklet also describes the many problems in determining prevalence of retardation, despite the fact that today's statisticians have ultra-sophisticated measuring tools.

IN MOST CASES, mental retardation is an invisible disability. A great many mildly retarded persons simply grow up, blend into the general population and disappear forever from the statistician's reach. Complicating the identification are the field professionals who do not always agree on the definition of mental retardation.

"The Prevalence of Mental Retardation" is available from the ARC, 1501 Avenue J, Arlington, TX 76011. $1.50 covers postage and handling.
