YOUR WEIGHT AND ARTHRITIS

Overweight people with arthritis no doubt have experienced the embarrassment of being told the following: "Lose weight! That will take care of your aching joints."

Relieving your joints of extra weight may seem sensible. However, it has never been proven that being overweight will cause your joints to wear at a greater rate than will occur for your thinner colleagues. Of course, being fat does put you at risk if you need a joint operation, and hampers recovery if you have injury or inflammation to your hips, knees or ankles.

Back pain is the one rheumatologic problem which being heavy worsens. In such instances healing requires that you maintain proper posture, the ability to stand suitably depends upon breathing with the stomach even with the chest wall, an action quite difficult for the obese to sustain.

At times I am tempted to blame a person's extra weight when my treatment is unsuccessful, to do so would be unfair to the patient. There are many good reasons to lose excess weight, preventing arthritis or ending joint aches are not among them.

Dr. Weiss welcomes questions from readers, please send your inquiries to his office.
