Breakdown of family unit may be accelerated by the absence of community

Is the family in trouble? Is the family, the backbone of our society and nation, experiencing difficult times?

Many would say yes. Rising divorce statistics, increasing cases of spouse abuse and child abuse, a decline in the number of couples getting married and the increase of couples living together without marriage, and the new demands for female liberation all have been used to support the claim that the family is in serious trouble.

The statistics are irrefutable. The number of divorces and decline of marriages, and the increasing incidence of abuse cannot be denied. The statistics do not tell us the whole story of the family crisis, but surely we can agree that all is not well.

GROWING UP in a rural community in mid-state Illinois, there was virtually nothing I could do that would not be either noted or reported to my family.

This included those experiences of significant accomplishments as well as those actions stemming from a momentary lack of good judgement. I truly lived in a community, and my family was nurtured and supported in that community.

It's not likely today that people make it a practice to call parents to support their offspring or to offer any praise in a nurturing discipline. Commending people and taking time to correct and counsel them is at best infrequent.

THE CAUSE for our family crisis, may however, lie outside the family. The breakdown of our family units may well have occurred because the pressure from outside the family became more than the family could withstand.

The family may not have collapsed from internal weaknesses or a flawed structure. The family may simply have been crushed by pressures outside and beyond its control.

Instead of being preoccupied primarily with the pathology of family breakdown, we ought to recognize the declining strength and support of traditional forms and patterns of community life that once worked hand-in-glove with family life.

OBVIOUSLY, the family crisis will not be resolved by only having people take their responsibility and care for one another more seriously. We have other patterns of life and institutions that need to be more care-full and sensitive to human needs as well.

Something as simple as the recognition of the women's contribution to the whole financial support of a family would be one small step for all females and a giant step for families.

The family is in trouble. We need to be grateful for its continued resiliency in the face of current pressures, and we need to take more seriously the failure of institutions and patterns of life that should aid and abet the family.

Nerve irritation is not part of aging process

Dear Jo:

Although I am over 70 years old and have had a back problem for the past five years (deteriorating discs) and surgery a year ago for "spurs" on the spine, I have what the doctors call Paresthesia. I had never heard of this condition before, which is a deep-seated burning, tingling sensation of the muscles. They say there is no cure.

Do you have any information as to treatment or relief of this plaguing condition?

I am a reader of Plus 60 Magazine and will appreciate your reply in a future issue. Thank you.

Mr. E.H.R., Tipton, Iowa.

Dear Mrs. R.:

You have defined Paresthesia correctly and to those readers who have not experienced this condition, it feels somewhat like the discomfort encountered when one hits one's elbow or "funny-bone" only the discomfort doesn't go away.

Paresthesia then, Mr. R., is not a disease, rather it is a symptom of some type of irritation to a nerve or nerves. It is sometimes experienced by post-surgical patients, diabetics and others. It is not caused by the normal aging process.

My advice is for you to consult a neurologist (nerve specialist) and to follow his/her advice, to locate a neurologist in your area, your doctor can refer you, or you can call a large general hospital and ask for the name of the neurologist on their staff.
