Lower loops show a sociable person

Dear Lorene:

I have been reading your column for a long time now and I was wondering what method you used to analyze a person's writing. Are there set rules in such an analysis?

I am 17 years old.

J.M., Ortonville

Dear J.M.:

There are two main schools of handwriting analysis. The trait analysts look at the shape of the individual letters, the other school looks at the gestalt or total picture of handwriting. I, personally, use both methods for an analysis. Everything a writer does on the sheet of paper has meaning for the analyst. Size, spacing, slant, margins, pressure, legibility, speed and simplification all contribute significant information about the writer.

Your large, legible handwriting with full lower loops tells me you are a social person who wants friends and social life. Recognition and attention you also desire. However, you often seem to set goals that do not challenge you enough. Setting your goals a little higher will provide more of the recognition you seek.

The mundane events of daily life are all encompassing. You are not a long-range planner but live for the moment.

The formative years of your life were spent in a home where the female authority figure was stronger than the male. Very early you wanted to stand on your own feet and be independent of these parental controls. As a result, you have become both independent and self-reliant. You can be open-minded and express empathy, especially with your peers.

There is a private side about you. Some things you do not care to share with others.

On the day you wrote this letter you were feeling quite optimistic about life (upslanted lines of writing).

Music seems to provide enjoyment for you... art may be another area.

If you have a question about your handwriting, write to Lorene C. Green, a certified graphologist, in care of this newspaper. Please use a full sheet of white, unlined paper writing in the first person singular. Age and handedness are also helpful. Feedback is always welcome.
