PUBLIC SENTIMENT HAS NO PRICE.

The fathers of Nathan Leopold, Jr., and Richard Loeb, the Chicago youths charged with the kidnaping and murder of Robert Franks, a school boy, announce that millions will not be spent in the defense of their sons, as the newspapers have been hysterically shrieking since the arrest of the alleged perpetrators of the fiendish crime.

It is not for a moment to be supposed that these millionaire fathers would not knock the head out of their money barrels if they thought such a course would result in an acquittal or even save suit from the gallows. It is their sons likely that they realize that a lavish and questionable expenditure of money will arouse public sentiment to such an extent as to make an escape from the gallows an impossibility.

It looks very much as though the fathers feel strongly that the attitude of the public will prove more of a factor in securing favorable consideration of their defense plans than will hair splitting arguments, obstructions and technicalities of an army of legal pulling attorneys, or the testimony of paid specialists.

The time was the smooth talk of the $500 a day expert witness with more letters after his name than a puppet ruler of a two by four kingdom. Not very long ago in consideration for and in consideration of a handsome fee informed a Michigan jury that a certain entry in a bank deposit book was not the handwriting of the cashier. He explained in minute detail in comparing the writing in the deposit book with the handwriting of the cashier why, in his opinion, they were not made by the same person.

The opposition was fortified by an expert who had, it was claimed, written numerous treaties on handwriting. After carefully examining his eye glasses the specialist examined the same handwritings, noting the peculiar letter formations and then solemnly stated that there was no doubt but that both were written by the same person.

Public sentiment, based on a knowledge of facts can be safely relied upon. It has no price. It can't be twisted or warped by paid attorneys and experts.

NOTICE

Like a warm breath of spring comes the announcement of the return of the perennial "Blossom Time," that exquisite Franz Schubert musical gem which captivated Detroit music lovers and theatergoers upon its former visits here earlier this season. "Blossom Time" is booked for a return engagement Sunday evening, June 15th, in response to thousands of requests. It comes here with the original New York Century Theatre cast and production after touring North, South, East and West, shimmering its light wherever it has been presented.

Into the score of "Blossom Time," are heard the "Unfinished Symphony," "Ave Maria," "The Serenade," "March Militaire," "Moment Musical," "The Brook," the famous "Two Waltzes," strains from the ballet "Rosamunde," "Hark, Hark the Lark," "Why?" and the "Melody Triste." Others are there too.

Dorothy Donnelly wrote the libretto. This actress (remember har Madame X?) has done well by the composer's life. She takes the part of an unfortunate who never confessed in life with the daughter of Count Esterhazy and makes it the basis for the romance of the opera.

Schubert has gone into the home of the Count as musical instructor for his daughters. It was one of the very few times in his life that he had a position, but it counted little in the long run. He fell in love with Countess Caroline Esterhazy, but never had the courage to tell her of it. He is said to written "The Serenade" for her.

In "Blossom Time" the "Serenade" is not sung by Schubert but by his Bohemian friends who SHOULD she put him to the supreme test? Dolly was wondering as she sat side by side with her man, Harry, as he spoke his words of love, his arm about her.

Someone she had never felt quite sure of Harry. She cared for him—but he didn't quite measure up to her standard of a man with her name. She was in many ways. And she was his own age—thirty, and infinitely older in experience.

After all, unless he could attain to that standard of magnanimity that she had set up, she didn't want him. That was what she was thinking as she listened to his confession.

"I feel I've got to tell you, darling, that my life hasn't been quite all it ought to be."

"You mean that there have been women in your life before?"

"Yes, that was what he was trying to tell her.

"In more than a—right way?"

"More than two! Three? Four? No, merely, sweethearts, but—everything? You understand?"

"Who were they? How many of them?" asked Dolly, with a beating heart. And as he was silent, "two? More than two? Three? Four? No, merely, sweethearts, but—everything? You understand?"

Counterfeit Money
 There is no rule by which counterfeiter money can be detected. Counterfeiters try to make their bogus money as much like real money as possible. Some counterfeit bills are such exact imitations that only experts can distinguish them from real bills. Sometimes counterfeit money is detected by the difference in the quality of paper used; again it may be recognized as counterfeit by secret signs and numbers which have not been observed by the counterfeiters. There are so many different kinds of paper money issued by the government that it is almost necessary for the individual to depend on bankers and other experts to detect bogus bills which may be in circulation.
