FARMINGTON AT BUILDERS' EXPOSITION

The Exchange Club of Farmington in deciding to get back of a plan to advertise this city as a desirable place of residence made no mistake in arranging for both the Builders' Exposition to be held at Detroit the last of February and first of March.

Last year over 200,000 people visited the exposition and it is expected that the number this year will pass the quarter million mark. These who visit such exhibitions are ones who are interested in homes and home building. Thousands of them are prospective buyers or builders who are looking about for an ideal home and an ideal location. With a convenient booth at the exposition, in charge of persons to furnish information regarding the excellent advantages offered by Farmington as a "home town," and with circulars and printed matter setting forth the same in detail, much will be accomplished in increasing interest in the superiority of Farmington.

We have here just what the majority of desirable home-seekers are looking for. The exposition is the right place to advertise.

In order to make a thorough success of the undertaking Farmington citizens must take a real interest in it.

A NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTION

A good way to start the New Year is to think about the troubles of the other fellow. And the other fellow may be your merchant, your tailor, your doctor, or your editor. Here is a little fable that will help you to understand what the editor is up against occasionally.

There was once a farmer who raised 2,000 bushels of potatoes. He sold the entire crop out at retail on credit—one bushel each to 2,000 customers. He thought he had made a good deal as he was to get $2,000 out of the year's work.

But the people to whom he made his sales neglected to pay. They just put it off from day to day, our friend the farmer kept crowding him to meet his obligations. He was placed in an uncomfortable predicament. None of the accounts was large enough to warrant him in making trouble. But in the aggregate they represented the fruits of a year's work.

And what happened after that?" you ask? Well we don't know for we didn't stay to hear the end of the story. But remember this. The editor is in something of the same fix that this unknown farmer got into. No single subscription account amounts to a great deal, but on the whole they represent the difference between profit and loss on the year's business.

Just think how you would like to get into such a mess, and then come into the office when you get your subscription statement and straighten up the account. It isn't much to you. But it is a lot to the editor.

LINK IN THE FAMILY CIRCLE

As an entertainment an educational device, the radio is far surpassing motion picture theatres, dance halls or any other form of public amusement.

A new horizon has been opened up by radio to millions of families living in the country, the town or the big city, a new means of culture.

The world in its larger centers is offering programs of good entertainment and instruction to people in their homes both by day and night, the new marvel drawing families together.

Young and old, instead of wandering idly in search of diversion, can hear an orchestra, a band, a pipe organ, a religious service or a good play, in their own home, be it in a city, on a farm, or miles away in mountains or desert.

There are lectures for the wits, literature to electricity and specialists give the latest ideas in dress, dancing, gardening or the various fields of scientific progress.

As broadcasting stations are enlarged to give better service over wider areas, radio will give still greater service to the nation.

FARMERS' OWN SCHOOL TO OPEN JANUARY 5

A half dozen special agricultural short courses, planned especially for the farmer, will start at M. A. C. on Monday, January 5.

Open to every one in the state over sixteen years of age, and offering opportunity for practical agricultural work, these courses are expected to draw a large enrollment from among the young men in the state who are already on the farms or who plan to get into agricultural fields.

The "short courses" are planned to meet the needs of those who cannot or who do not care to take the full four year agricultural courses at the college. They are condensed to the limit, as much practical work as time will permit being crowded into the short terms offered. Demand for men to fill positions where special agricultural training is required (official cow testers, for instance) is met very largely by graduates of the winter farm courses.

The courses starting January 5 are as follows: general agricultural, eight weeks; dairy production, ten weeks; dairy management, eight weeks; horticulture, eight weeks; poultry, four weeks; farm engineering, eight weeks.

CANNERS-GROWERS TO CO-OPERATE IN TESTS

Fruit and vegetable growers on the one hand, and state canners on the other will join forces to aid in formulating a program of experimental work for the horticultural forces at the Michigan Agricultural College, according to announcement made this week by Prof. V. R. Gardner, head of the M. A. C. horticultural department.

A joint committee of canners will meet at East Lansing during the coming Farmers Week, the first week in February, to work out the details of the recommendations, it is understood. These recommendations will later be taken up by the college and incorporated into its experimental program.

The movement is expected to serve two ends; bringing the canners and growers of the state into closer relationship and at the same time, by having M. A. C. "straight dope" from the field as to just what problems are of vital importance to the fruit and vegetable interests of Michigan.

The college but recently completed successful tests to develop a "Michigan" variety of canning tomatoes which will better meet the needs of both growers and canners. Similar work of adaptation along other lines will be attempted on a larger scale in the future, the recommendations which will be drawn up by the joint committee serving as a basis for the planning of this work.

Mice Would Do the Trick

Lord Castleton's richly humorous Irish recollections includes this gem: "There was a man, named Billy Murchy, who had a bad fall and was to be laid for three or four weeks. A great friend and a great humorist named Briscoe went to see him one day. 'Well, Billy,' he said, 'how are you?' 'I'm getting better, Henry,' he said, 'but I'm very miserable.' 'What ails you?' asked Briscoe; 'are the daughters and the wife not good to you?' 'They are, indeed,' said Billy, 'but my bed's very bad. I'm all covered with spots from crabs of toad and bread, and I'm always scratching myself for easement.' 'By gorry, Billy, I'll soon settle that,' exclaimed his friend. 'I'll go in to Clonnel and buy a pack of white mice, then I'll lay them on you, and you'll be all right in a few minutes.'—San Francisco Argonaut.

The Vengeful Flivver

"Hey, there! What's coming off?" cried the proprietor of the Rialto Picture store in Peoria, to a man who had dashed in at the front door, continued into the back room and was trying to raise one of the rear windows. "Where are you going?" "Doing answers that my life will be safe," yelled back the party interrupted. "I cranked up my Hootie! Nanny out there, and it started to follow me all over the street!" "Great Gosh! Won't it try to come here?" "I hope not! When I dodged it went into the millinery shop next door."—Kansas City Star.

Conviction Unchanged

"I have long argued that there isn't $25 worth of chicken salad in the whole world," says J. Fuller Gloom. And the fact is, he is right. He recently cleared $20 on a chicken salad supper does not in any way alter his opinion.—Kansas City Star.

Shot an Arrow Into the Air

By HAROLD HOWLAND

(C. Doubleday, Page & Co.)

ERIC LANDOR glanced at the enclosure before reading the letter. Hello! That fool letter of his came back? Well, he had expected it. Two weeks now he had been busy denying to himself that he expected anything from that wild impulse of his. You don't get results in this strange business of life by such simple means as writing a proposal of marriage and dropping it into the post box at the corner. The offer of a chap's heart and hand and bank account and everything needed a little more warmth than that to get across. Such a dumb proceeding, didn't even deserve an answer. But, by the Great Jehovah, he'd got an answer—or something! Here it came, home to roost. What on earth could it say? He read the letter with feelings that would have done credit to a chameleon on a patchwork quilt.

"Dear Mr. Landor," he read. "I don't know how to justify myself. Indeed, I hardly know how to explain myself. Well, here goes: I once lived at 100 Park Avenue."

Oh, indeed? Was that so? Eric Landor, who was not used to being "little more than a name" to the people of his world. He didn't quite like the implication. But he read on.

"It wasn't until I had hashed the torn envelope out of the waste-basket that I realized what I had done."

He picked the torn envelope up himself and read the address: "Miss Evelyn Anstruther, 100 Park Avenue, New York."

Yes, that was all right. Nice name, he thought. Half automatically he turned over the letter which he had been reading and looked at the signature. "Peggy Anstruther." Nice name, too. But obviously not the same. Not even a distant mother or a tongue-tied brother of two or so could have turned "Evelyn" into "Peggy." He began to suspect that the address of his impetuous proposal of marriage and the letter which was now returning it were not one and the same. In pleased enjoyment of his detective skill he read on.

"I dashed from head to foot with the horror of it. What could I do? I couldn't send the letter back to its rightful owner and let her know that a stranger had read the lovely things you had written to her. But must I do something. How indignantly you must be waiting for your answer. I must let you know immediately why you had not had it. So here is your nice proposal, sadly marred by my alien hand and eye. Pray forgive me. It is all that I can say, except—I may be very happy. I know she will."

She signed herself faithfully his, this interloping Peggy Anstruther. There was a postscript.

He read the letter again, slowly. Nice letter, he thought. Not even Evelyn could have written a nicer one, he decided. Indeed, would Evelyn's have been so nice, he questioned. Any way, Peggy's letter deserved a nice answer, he concluded. He couldn't let the poor girl go on blushing from head to foot for lack of his forgiveness. He wrote:

"I am deeply but fraudulently recipient of My Heart's Outpourings: I am eager to forgive you, but forgiveness on paper is so cold. May I not do it in person? Do you drink tea?"

He signed himself faithfully hers, Eric Landor. Then he contemplated with calm eyes his proposal to Evelyn. He did not send it forth again.

Two impatient days brought a brief reply.

"The Ritz, Tuesday, at five. I shall wear lilacs of the valley—to symbolize the penitent's white gown. I must carry a tall candle, but—you know the Ritz."

While they waited for the tea he forgave her. "Would Evelyn forgive me, too?" she wondered. "No one would forgive you quicker," he said, and told her what intricate letters she wrote. "Nicer than Evelyn's?" she asked. "She has never written me one," he said, and told her what lovely ones she had. "Nothing like Evelyn's?" she suggested. "When I look into yours, there is no Evelyn," he said, and asked her to marry him. "I would," she answered straight and fair. "If there were no Evelyn."

"There isn't," he said. "I am a poor devil of a writer. I needed to know how it felt to propose to a girl. If I should propose to one in person, she might accept me. I couldn't take the risk, for there was no girl that I loved. So I wrote a proposal to a mythical Evelyn and sent it to an address where I knew no Evelyn lived. I thought then that I had learned how it felt to propose to a girl. Now I know that I had."

"Why, yes," she said. "Will you light my cigarette?"

"I can't," he said in a moment. "My hand won't stop its trembling. You'll have to ask the waiter."

So a waiter, whose hand was as steady as a church, had finished his task, Eric Landor asked her a question.

"Why did you come to tea with me? To teach you how it felt to propose to a girl," she said.

"How did you know that I didn't know?" he asked.

"From your letter, to Evelyn," he said. "My hand didn't tremble when you wrote that."

"How did you know that I would propose to you?" he asked.

"They always do," she said, "when I'm penitent."

NOT DELICATE ENOUGH

"There's been a great drop in prices." "So? None of the economists have reported the shock, however, I'm sure."

White Blueberries

White strawberries, white currants and white raspberries are not uncommon, but it remains for the town of Whitewater, Maine, to have the distinction of having white blueberries growing within its limits, says the Boston Globe. This frank of nature occurs on land owned by Sewall Allen, who is very careful of his treasure and allows only a very few to be picked.

Garden Curiosities

The latest addition to the season's garden freaks was found by Arthur C. Miller of Auburn, N. Y., when in digging potatoes he found one spud affectionately wrapped around the end of a horse hair. Another unusual specimen in his garden was a squash vine which has produced two squashes, one of the green variety, the other yellow.
