WASHINGTON TRIP GOOD ADVERTISING

The Seniors' campaign to raise funds for a visit to our capital city is interesting of observation, if only for the multitude of bi-products it is displaying. Lessons in thrift, dependability, resourcefulness, initiative, are all being learned while the elusive dollar is being chased.

One result of this effort to visit Washington, while of no great material wealth to the Seniors themselves is of practical value to the community. The trip to Washington and return is the widest spread advertising propaganda that our village has done in one hundred and one years of its existence.

A group of typical high school young men and girls can not spend several days in any city, not even Washington, without advertising their home town.

These young people will represent Farmington to all whom they meet. They are "Farmington, Michigan" to those who cross their path. Their courtesy, manners, their interest and intelligence, their good humor, enthusiasm and evidence of home training declared to be typical of those same characteristics to be found in Farmington, Michigan. It is a burden and responsibility for the young people. They realize that they are the advertisement of their community as well as of their high school.

Every father, mother or friend who contributes an old tie to the rummage collection, a pie to a bake sale, or a stack of old papers to the junk collection, is investing in good advertising for Farmington. Not every village the size of ours and this distance from the capital can boast a crowd of young folks capable to putting such a scheme across.

The high school Seniors appreciate their opportunity and responsibility, while the community appreciates that "On to Washington" for the Seniors is but propaganda to "Make Farmington Your Home Town," to those whom they meet.

Turtle's Wound Healed by Skillful Surgeon

No, sir, you can't fill the teeth of a turtle; it hasn't got any to be filled. But, after all, it's not so well off at that, because when anything goes wrong it, can happen in so many places.

As a matter of fact, it offers the largest practice ground for dentists known to science. Although its teeth can't be filled, most of the rest of it can be. That was proved recently.

There arrived in New Orleans on the steamer Heredia, an Atlantic green turtle, name and address unknown; age, twenty-five years; weight, 220 pounds; height, inconsiderable. When the turtle reached the aquarium, W. G. Seligman, director, discovered that its shell had been punctured.

Through the hole, which was an inch in diameter, the turtle had slipped a quart or more of water. This was drained out and a piece of shell removed. Then the hole was rinsed with a dilute solution of carbolic acid.

Then came the filling, a liberal dose of melted paraffin. This was covered with a layer of adhesive plaster and a coating of warm tar. The turtle tar, which sits up and takes nourishment, which consists of about two pounds of fish a day.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

British National Anthem

Henry Carey is credited with being the author of the British national anthem. He died in London in the year 1743. The anthem came first into fame in the autumn of 1745, when it was sung, and encased with repeated bursts, at Drury Lane theater, as a loyal retort to the proclamation of the Pretender at Edinburgh. Carey's authorship has been discredited by several good authorities. One story says that the anthem was sung in Latin in James II's chapel, and was preserved as a Jacobite hymn, the music from an air composed by Dr. John Bull. Carey died, after a lifelong struggle for existence, leaving a family in want; yet he had given us a blessed heritage in the ballad, "Rally to the Ally." He added to our language the expression "Nimby-pamby," a title of some of his verses.

The Cinderella Fellow

By JANE OSBORN

(Copyright)

"It's the most terrible thing in the world, not having a man in the family," sighed Mrs. Denry. "There are all sorts of little things they can do. I could ask Melly to prop a ladder against the side of the garage and climb on the roof and find out what that object really is, but she might leave."

"Well, it's your own fault," declared Ruth Denry, her daughter. "I mean having a man in the family. You've had suitors enough, goodness knows, but I can climb up and get that mysterious object."

Ten minutes later the charming suburban Ruth scrambled to the top of the garage and found the "mysterious object" to be what had once been the rocker of a chair. Besides this she found an out-of-date movie guide book and a brass candlestick.

The vintage of the garage roof she looked about to see from whence these missiles might have come. Thirty or so feet away stood a neighboring house, all but the roof of which was hidden from her own place by the thickly set hedge and row of poplar trees that stood at the back of her garage. Ruth hadn't an idea who had moved into the house, nor had she wondered until now.

"Here's exhibits A, B and C," she said, climbing down and laying the articles before her mother. "Seem to come from the house in back. But, really, why would anybody throw things at a poor, unoffensive garage?"

"I suppose," said Mrs. Denry with decision, "on account of Tutankhamun. And he has such a musical voice, too."

Ruth put the objects collected from the garage, roof in a corner of the cellar, and the matter might have been forgotten then had it not been for the very next day Mrs. Denry came in from the back yard bringing a shoe.

"Look a-here," said she, dropping the shoe on the floor of the living room. "That's what they're firing at Tut now."

Mrs. Denry regarded the shoe with considerable suspicion, and then asked Ruth to put it down cellar with the other missiles directed at the musical Tutankhamun. But Ruth protested.

Of course the man who owned such a good shoe would want it back. They'd better send it around. But the mother objected.

"Anyone rude enough and ill-bred enough and unfeeling enough to throw things at a cat who was simply singing like any other cat deserves no consideration."

It was that very evening that Ruth saw a strange young man crawl through the tangle of privet and poplar trees.

"There's the Cinderella man," said Ruth. "I must run out and tell him he has his shoe."

"You'd do nothing of the sort," said her mother emphatically.

It happened that Mrs. Denry went away for a short visit the next day, or that would have been the end of it. Ruth hit upon the idea of watching developments from the vantage point of the garage roof, and fooled herself into thinking that her mother would not object if she were home. So eleven o'clock found Ruth comfortably seated on a pillow and a steamer rug. She had kept the cat in all day and had only let him out before she climbed to the roof. He was sure to be in due voice. The town clock had just rung midnight when that began. For full five minutes he warbled forth his feeble melody. Then a screen was raised with something of a bang in the house behind the garage. A figure leaped out of the window, and Ruth could see the features of the dim moonlight. Another missile came sailing through the window, this time curving toward the garage roof. It seemed headed straight for her. Ruth ducked down, hiding her head behind her pillow, and said, "Oh, oh," and then realized that the danger was over, and a shoe was lying on the roof beside her.

"Did I hit some one?" asked the deep voice.

"It wasn't your fault if you didn't," answered Ruth.

"How did I know you'd be out there?" he countered. "It's most unusual. I was just trying to frighten off that miserable cat."

"It can't be done," called Ruth, and then, thinking that the voice of a rather pleasant "now I've both shoes. If you want them you might come around—56 Green avenue. And there are some other things besides. But you'll have to apologize for the way you've been treating our cat."

So it was that Roger Todd made his first call on Ruth Denry. He had made three by the time her mother returned a week later.

"After that, when Ruth told her mother of her engagement, her mother's eyes shone with tears of contentment.

"I am so glad it's Roger," she said. "At first I was just a little afraid he was the Cinderella man that was so unkind to poor Tut—living just behind us—and his shoes really do look precisely like the ones you found in the garden that day. But Roger's so considerate to Tut. By the way, what he came of that odd shoe?"

"I gave that back to the Cinderella man while you were away," said Ruth truthfully, not wanting her mother to be disappointed with the thought that her future son-in-law had once been so ill-disposed toward her precious cat.
