His Sartorial Diplomacy

By H. IRVING KING

(Copyright)

OLDSBURG was a rather considerable town. The hotel, which stood on an eminence overlooking the sea, was a good one, and drummers liked to stop there. Two of them, however, of dinner sat on the hotel piazza after dinner and consumed with nature and with each other. They were Bixby, hardware, and Carpenter, mill supplies.

"Bixby was saying, 'from here I shall take a jump to Boston, and then go down home for a rest of a week or so and get acquainted with the wife and kids.'"

"So you are married?" ventured Carpenter.

"Yes, married five years now, and got two of the finest kids you ever saw boys, Harold and Quentin—my wife chose the names."

"I—I am engaged," said Carpenter, who was much the younger of the two. "I thought so," was the reply. "I thought so from the nobby way in which you dress. You wouldn't think so to look at me, but before I was married I was the noblest dresser in Riverport, Me. That's the way I got my wife. You see, it was this way. The two prettiest girls—and the two best girls, if I do say it—in Riverport were the Thurston sisters—Margaret and Nellie. Margie was the elder sister, and was an awfully swell girl, and she seemed to me to be just the girl for me. I thought that everything Margie said or did was about right; but there was one subject upon which they did not agree. Margie was a crank on dress—more dress—she seemed to get on with her when you had to mind your p's and q's in the raiment question. Nellie, on the other hand, didn't seem to know what the correct thing was in such matters. She seemed to care a hang, either. There was Butter White, White and I were constant callers at the Thurston house—I wasn't traveling then and had time to do my courting and so on. But, if you will believe me, But showed up at the Thurston's one night with a dress suit on and lavender socks and a four-in-hand tie.

"Nellie didn't seem to see anything unusual in this, but up here, commented But on his taste in selecting his neckwear. But Margie! I thought she would have a fit. First she stared at him. Then she left the room with her head tossed up and would not speak to But again all that evening. I sat out on the piazza with her, comforting her.

"I tried to defend But all I could by hinting that his great-grandfather had been a bit queer, and that a great aunt on his mother's side had died of senile dementia. But extenuating circumstances were ruled out of court. But was condemned without benefit of clergy. That was only one of the crimes in the dress line that But committed. He seemed to have a genius for perpetrating sartorial outrages, every one of which was more shocking to Margie than its predecessor. But as for Nellie, she would as like as not calmly remark after one of But's most flagrant exhibitions of taste depravity that she did not see anything so very criminal in Mr. White's costume. Margie bought a little book entitled 'What a Gentleman Should Wear' and gave it to her sister, but the only result was that, after reading it, Nellie asked, 'Why should he?'

"As for me, being very much in love, I kept my raiment right up to date, and was so absolutely correct in my wearing apparel that the only male companion I was fit to associate with were the fashion plates in the circulars of the swell New York and London tailors. I had a little nestegg in the bank, and I knew it in my clothes. I made a study of the thing, and when I really put my mind on a subject I generally get there with both feet. Being, as I have before remarked, very much in love, I determined to please Margie, if it took the last dollar in the bank and the latest waistcoat.

"And I did please Margie. Every time I called she would give me the once-over and pronounce me perfect. White was a good foil to me, I'll acknowledge. And more than that, I knew that Margie was constantly telling her sister what a dandy dresser I was and contrasting me with poor But. Well, things dragged along this way for six months. It was tough on me and on my bankroll, but it was worth it, for, as I have perhaps remarked before, I was very much in love. For But didn't waken, I'll say that for him. He kept calling at the Thurston's just the same, and seemed to get kinder callous to Margie's unfeeling remarks about his clothes. He made some attempt at reformation, but it wasn't in him.

"Well, at the end of six months But and I both proposed and were accepted."

"And so," said Carpenter, "Miss Margaret Thurston became the present Mrs. Bixby?"

"Not on your life," replied Bixby. "The present Mrs. Bixby was formerly Nellie Thurston. But White married Margie."

"But I thought you said that you were very much in love and, therefore, determined to please Miss Margaret?"

"I did say so," replied Bixby. "I was in love with Nellie, and Nellie was so much under the influence of her sister, that Margie, had I not gained her good graces, might have been a stumbling block in my path. So I removed her—annihilated her as an obstacle with the lightning of my sartorial elegance."
