Teacher recognized for speech work

Candace Simon, speech pathologist with the Farmington Public Schools special-education department, received the Program-of-the-Year Award from the Michigan Speech-Language-Hearing Association.

The presentation was made at the Association annual conference in Battle Creek.

Simon was recognized by her colleagues for the development of two exceptional programs serving students in the fluency and listening problems.

Stutterers served by the fluency program showed marked improvement within the first four sessions.

The program has been found to be effective for all ages, young children through adults.

The listening program which serves a middle-school educably mentally impaired population assists students in developing basic concepts and listening skills.

The Program-of-the-Year Award is an annual presentation made by the association. There are over 1,000 speech-language and hearing programs in the public schools throughout Michigan. Simon's program was one of five selected for recognition in 1984.
