Workshop studies 'Baby Doe' ethics

The media's recent coverage of the Baby Doe story detailed the medical and ethical choices that confront parents and doctors when a critically handicapped child is born. What makes the decision whether or not to treat or continue to treat a critically ill or handicapped newborn? What criteria is used in making that decision? Should the cost of medical care enter into that decision?

Mercy College of Detroit will attempt to handle these and other questions with feeling, objectivity and critical assessment during their workshop, "Baby Doe: Ethics and Neonatal Intensive Care," from 8:30 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday, May 1.

The workshop, sponsored by Mercy College of Detroit's Office of Continuing Education and Mount Carmel Mercy Hospital Department of Pediatrics, will address issues affecting hospital administrators, ethics committees, physicians, nurses, social workers and pastoral care personnel.

Topics will include the medical realities and ethical issues surrounding the care of premature, critically ill, and handicapped newborns; the parents' perspective; the moral obligation to save lives; ethics and the cost of care; and decision-making in the "Baby Doe" cases.

Leonard J. Weber, Ph.D., Mercy College professor of Religion and Medical Ethics and a workshop speaker, said the workshop is a response to the need for a systematic, careful analysis of the issues.

"There's a growing realization that the issues faced here are not solely medical ones, but rather ones that concern values and the setting of priorities. Questions that were often previously considered to be only medical issues now involve the public," said Weber.

The workshop fee is $50, which includes registration, materials, lunch and refreshment breaks. Registration deadline is Monday, April 23. For further information, call Mercy's Continuing Education Office, 552-5224.

The workshop has been approved for six hours of Continuing Medical Education credit (Category I) by Mount Carmel Mercy Hospital, Detroit.

YOUR STOMACH AND ARTHRITIS
An important relationship exists between the stomach and arthritis: most of the drugs that are good for arthritis are bad for the stomach. A chemical that is produced in the stomach protects the stomach lining from being dissolved by the acid that the stomach produces. This same substance - prostaglandin - is part of a series of chemicals that produce inflammation in joints. Drugs that stop development of inflammation in joints work by preventing production of prostaglandin. Ideally, a drug for use against arthritis should allow production of prostaglandin in the stomach where its protective effects against ulcer. At the same time, such a drug should stop prostaglandin production in joints. However, this perfect medication remains to be developed. Physicians are aware of this unwanted effect to the stomach of drugs used to fight arthritis. Therefore in patients who are prone to ulcer, rheumatologists will use less medication and depend more on heat, rest, exercise and joint aspiration to control joint pain and swelling.
