

The tradition of making holiday presents and decorations can keep children constructively busy while parents pursue their holiday chores.

ence encourages the child to want to do it again. If a child's creative effort is not appreciated, the child feels disappointed and his self-esteem plummets. Studies show that, in a child's mind, creating anything, whether to keep or give away, is far from child's play. It is serious business. "This is like building skills in your business work," says Lewis. "What a Ph.D. is to us, building with blocks is to a child. It may sound simplistic but it is really creative work in the business of learning."
