

Computers have grown more and more powerful, but they're coming in smaller and smaller packages. Those savvy little portables that can easily toted in a briefcase or book bag could be an attractive holiday gift item.

said, is that even if a family that bought a portable unit later decides that it requires all the capabilities of a personal computer with a full-size screen, the portable can still be used in special situations, complementing the desktop computer.

Adults can use the portable on the road and transfer the information to the bigger computer at home, if the bigger computer has a modem and communications software. Students can take the portable computer to school to take notes and then load the information into the computer at home during the evening, if the homeowner has bought all the additional necessary hardware and software.

In shopping for any computer, a prospective buyer first should make a list of what the computer will be used for and determine their price range. Some shoppers still may decide to buy a low-cost home system or a very powerful personal computer, but at least the selection of portable machines has created a third choice.
