Let them eat wedding cake

Old-fashioned wedding cakes — those traditional all-white confectionary towers — may be a thing of the past.

Although the cake is here to stay, today's couples are personalizing their wedding cakes in a number of ways.

White spongecake is customary and still the choice of many. But brides and grooms who are chocolate lovers or carrot cake-fans are determined to be recognized. Some couples are striking a compromise with tradition by offering vanilla in one tier and another flavor in another. Unusual and gourmet fillings also are showing up — anything from fruit mousse to liqueur-flavored creams.

Three or four round tiers are being replaced at some weddings by square, rectangular or heart shapes. And the familiar swirled white frosting decorations are sharing the stage with pink hearts, blue scallops, bright marzipan flowers or fresh flowers inserted into water-filled vials.

The ornament that sits on top of the cake offers the greatest room for imagination. The time-honored bride and groom, wedding bells and lovebirds remain popular. But these days, you're just as likely to find a tiny music box that plays "The Wedding March," Miss Piggy and Kermit or a miniature bicycle celebrating the fact that the couple met on a cross-country biking trip.

Some couples are nostalgically giving their cake a touch of history by borrowing a topper that appeared years before on their parent's wedding cake.
