Ways to make gardening interesting

down to earth
Alice
Burlingame

This summer, 125 groups of young people and seniors from 42 states are recipients of awards by the National Garden Association valued at $500 each.

These awards are a part of the association's program to encourage rewarding techniques to be applied to programs of gardening.

A California participant said, "The grant has boosted every level of self esteem in many who had despaired of being able to garden again."

Gardening provides us with many ways to make the hobby interesting. If you have a straight, center stalk on a geranium, you can pinch off the lower branches and repeat in an ornamental container placing a stick next to the central stalk and secured with a twist-tie until the plant becomes study.

It can become an interesting tree for conversation. You could have a geranium tree for a long period of time if you put it where it gets good light and you don't go on a vacation and let it dry up.

In our area, the Michigan Regional

Lily Society is busy promoting this interesting flower category. They have displays and opportunities for amateurs to become better acquainted with their specialty. You may call Kathryn Briggs in Farmington, 474-4008, who will be glad to share the technique of growing these flowers for optimum beauty.

If on your property you have trees which were planted with grass growing up to the base of the tree, may I suggest that you make a margin around the base of the tree about five inches where you have deposited a generous placement of peat moss to discourage the invasion of a tree with a lawn mower.

Another idea to protect the bark and root area at the base of the tree is to use pachysandra to give protection from a lawn mower. Of course this plant is greedy and
