Call ahead if dining out Christmas Day

By Peter Ianni

SINCE PEOPLE who own and work at restaurants like to spend Christmas with their families, this can be a busy spot for holiday dining and present special problems.

If you plan on dining out on Christmas, may I suggest that you pay particular attention to the following pointers:

Above all, phone first. Double-check to make sure the restaurant of your choice will be open, and its hours. Nail down your reservation. This is a top rule for all dining out anytime, and it's doubly important for Christmas.

As a rule of thumb, almost every hotel has at least one of its restaurants open on Christmas to serve its own and other customers.

Although some ethnic restaurants are open on Christmas, many are closed. And, of those that are open, few serve traditional Christmas meals such as turkey and ham.

Ask about price. Some restaurants take advantage of the fact that the establishment is open, and charge holiday prices over the norm. Regular customers may be able to surprise.

SINCE MANY people like alcoholic beverages to help them make merry, ask about spirits available. Beer and wine only, full bar or no alcohol at all. Unless you want a "dry" Christmas, ask what type of license the establishment has before making reservations.

Ask about special events and programs. During the holidays, restaurants may sponsor visits from Santa, dance, concerts or plays.

If appropriate for your family, ask about a children's menu.

Ask about special rates and events for large groups. Some restaurants allow you to host a large event and make merry without the fuss. You may be able to set up a private bar for your family and friends in a separate dining room.
