

Bench docket expands

47th District Court's small claims cases increase dramatically

"Where cases were once referred to company attorneys, companies are handling it (lawsuits) themselves. The net result is a great increase (in small claims cases)."

District Judge

JUDGE JOSEPH Wagner has never heard a case in Farmington's 47th District Court. But his nationally syndicated People's Court television program has brought law and justice into the American home, and is one of several things encouraging use of the small claims court, local judges contend.

Not only are judges today more interested about the legal system, but they can sue for more money in small claims court as of Jan. 1. An increase in the civil small claims dollar limit in January, 1985, took the ceiling from $600 to $1,000.

With another increase last week, consumers can now sue for $1,500 maximum per small claims case. This compares with the original small claims ceiling of $300 imposed with the creation of the district court system in 1968.

The 1985 dollar increase resulted in a 58-percent increase in small claims cases filed in 47th District Court during the past year, Judge Margaret Schaeffer said. Both district judges expect caseload increases again in 1986.

"The increase is going to be dramatic," Judge Michael Hand predicted.

BUSINESS USE of the small claims system is on the rise, Hand added. "Where cases were once referred to company attorneys, companies are handling it (lawsuits) themselves. The net result is a great increase (in cases)."

Chief Civil Clerk Marilyn Dewar said an increase in contractual-related cases and those related to quality of workmanship has been noted.

"Poor workmanship" is one of the main reasons for small claims lawsuits, she said. "A lot more people are stopping payment on checks."

The 1985 ceiling increase resulted in a 58-percent increase in small claims cases filed in 47th District Court during the past year, said Judge Margaret Schaeffer (above).

The increased use of small claims creates "more work for the clerks" and the cases take "longer to try," according to Judge Schaeffer.

"The clerks have to help the people file the cases," and sometimes "non-partient" information is given during trial which takes more time, she added.

ONE CLERK spends most of an eight-hour day handling small claims cases in the court's civil division, Dewar said. It now takes 60 days for a case to be placed on the docket once filed.

The 47th District Court currently schedules small claims cases two Mondays each month from 1:45 p.m. which Dewar said may have to be increased as dictated by caseload.

Other solutions are under way to help court workers as caseload increases. Additional computer space and terminals were recently approved by Farmington and Farmington Hills city councils.

The automation will allow clerks more time helping the public, and less time doing recordkeeping, Judge Schaeffer said. Without the computer enhancements, an additional 2-3 clerks would have been needed, she said.

time to help with the small claims docket as well. Acting as mediators, they attempt to settle cases before they are heard by judges.

"Many times, nobody has talked." Schaeffer said of the plaintiff and defendant. The mediation process was started two years ago, and has helped relieve the court dockets, she added.

Persons with a legal cause of action, or who live in or do business in Farmington or Farmington Hills, can bring a small claims action in 47th District Court, according to Dewar.

A small claims action for libel, slander or fraud, and in some cases against municipalities, cannot be brought. If a suit is filed against a municipality, a judge decides the immunity issue, she added.

Small claims filing fees for the plaintiff are $10 for claims up to $600 and $20 for claims from $601-$1,500. A $3 certified mail fee is charged for serving papers on the defendant. An additional fee is charged for personally serving papers if the defendant cannot be reached by certified mail, Dewar said.

A small claims decision is final and cannot be appealed, Schaeffer said. A defendant has the option, however, of moving the case to district court.
