feel intimidated by quiz games because they don't know all the answers.

THE OBJECT OF the game is to complete a three-year degree from "Inquisitive University" by going around the board three times, acquiring and validating eight credits in at least six different subjects.

With clues included in the questions, players have more than one chance to get the answers right.

Creators of "The Sailor's Game," which includes pewter marker replicas of five classic yacht designs, say it can be a challenge for the most advanced yachtsman or enjoyed by those who don't know the difference between port and starboard.

With no dice to roll or wheels to spin, it features questions covering seamanship, yachtsman's know-how and traditions of the sea.

Other board games new on the holiday scene this year include "Pictionary," which resembles charades, except that players quickly draw clues instead of acting them out. The subject matter, selected at random by landing on a category square, ranges from "moonlight" to "diaper rash."

The magical world of My Little Pony is one of the toy offerings this holiday season. It's a collection of lovable little characters from the land beyond the rainbow.
