

France recruiting American business

by American companies or the American government. To them, we're non-profit entities. We are paid by French communities to represent them abroad."

The company chose Troy — and the Detroit area — as its headquarters because of the diversity of businesses the region offers. "When we investigated the possibilities of setting up an office in the U.S., we found this area to be most centrally located in the Midwest, with access to many surrounding major metropolitan areas within 500 miles."

With companywide 1987 revenues at $600,000 and 1988 revenues projected at $1 million, RDI, which began operations in France in 1981, is continuing its yearly achievement of 60 percent growth.

"We've actually profited handsomely from our smallness," Bondy said. "We use our resources wisely — through networking of many people within the business community in France. We have nearly 60 specialized communicators that provide us with information."

Because of those networkers, according to Bondy, information RDI can provide is accurate, reliable and fast.

"It can take a company, which takes the normal route of inquiry, up to six months to receive information we can normally provide within 24 hours of inquiry," he said. "That's what entices companies to come to us for answers."
