WHAT CAN I DO TO PREVENT ARTHRITIS?
Arthritis results from one or more of the following injury, aging, heredity, infection, auto-immunity, and joint irritation. There is little from this list that you can control except injury. By being careful in your choice of recreation, and lucky in your ability to avoid mishaps, you may help bring your joints to a long and trouble-free life. Otherwise, what brings on arthritis is beyond your control to correct or prevent. But your intervention is important. Repeated use when combined with moderate stress helps ligaments keep their strength, muscles to maintain their tone, and joint cartilage to preserve its integrity. What constitutes "moderate stress?" The answer comes from your knowledge and edge of the activities that you can undertake without causing undue and prolonged pain to your muscles and joints. In practice, undertaking moderate stress means walking, swimming, biking, or jogging as far and long as you are capable of doing. By going to your full measure, you do not wear out your joints, but preserve their state of health. At the same time, you have done what you can reasonably expect from yourself to prevent arthritis.
