SECOND OPINIONS

If an orthopedic surgeon tells you that you need a replacement knee or hip, you consider it reasonable to see another orthopedist to confirm the first physician's evaluation. You should feel the same freedom to seek a second opinion in the medical diagnosis of your arthritic condition. Since you may require a lifetime of therapy, you are exercising good sense to substantiate the diagnosis and treatment presented by the initial doctor. If you obtain a second opinion, you should, in fairness to the first doctor, find a second physician of equal training and experience. You should provide the second doctor with as much information as possible: x-rays, blood feets, and medical records of your pest freatment, finally, you of your condition.

Obtaining a second opinion can be a satisfying experience, Either you aim confidence to carry on the program previously outlined, or, you have also to seek medical care more appropriate for your needs.
