Study: More women abuse

AP — The number of women who sexually abuse children may be two to three times higher than previously thought, according to a study by a University of Michigan researcher who attributed the increase more to awareness than a boost in case numbers.

In a clinical study of 308 abuse cases studied over a 10-year period at the University of Michigan Interdisciplinary Project on Child Abuse and Neglect, social psychologist Kathleen Coulborn Faller found that women were the abusers in almost 14 percent of the cases.

Of those 40 women, 85 percent abused their own children, with daughters abused two-thirds of the time.

The researcher said previous indications were that women were the abusers in 4 percent to 6 percent of abuse cases.

Ms. Coulborn Faller presented the study Friday at the National Association of Social Workers annual conference in Philadelphia.

"While the incidents are higher than earlier clinical estimates, this probably represents an increased awareness rather than increased incidence of sexual abuse by women," she said.

IN ADDITION, almost one-third of the female abusers, most of whom were in their 20s, were mentally retarded or had suffered brain damage. In most of those incidents, according to Coulborn Faller, a man, either a husband or boyfriend, was the initiator of sexual abuse, according to the victims' statements.

Coulborn Faller said mentally impaired women are "easily led" and are accustomed to a man controlling their behavior. She said they also may not understand the seriousness of what they are doing.

"Our findings also suggest that women are not the initiators, but that they are persuaded, coerced, or otherwise drawn into sexual abuse by men," said Coulborn Faller. The sexual abuse by women "may be yet another illustration of the unfortunate effects of male dominance."

The study found several characteristics of female child abusers. About 60 percent of the women in the study had sexually abused more than one child.
