

Government offers training, experience to students in co-op

For years, high school and college students have gained practical experience working for participating companies in cooperative education programs.

But many students probably don't realize one of the country's biggest employers, the federal government, is among those employers who take part in "co-op" programs.

Federal co-op jobs are available to high school students at least 16 years old and to college students, both undergraduate and graduate.

According to Maryann Reid, a personnel staffing specialist with the U.S. government, college students can gain experience in a variety of fields from engineering and accounting to contracting and supplies. The best job possibilities for high school students, she says, are in office work.

REID, A GUEST on the weekly cable television program "The Job Show" at 6:30 p.m. Thursday, Dec. 8, on Metrovision Channel 12 said students work full or part-time, depending on how their school has structured the cooperative experience. They are assigned a Government Service (GS) rating and earn the same hourly wage as other employees at that level.

One of the most attractive features of the program, says Reid, may be the fact that a co-op job can often be the first step to a government career after graduation.

"The federal cooperative program is designed to lead to permanent employment," she said. In fact, cooperative jobs are usually only created when there will be a permanent need for that position.

Reid advised students to contact their school cooperative training or placement office for more information about their school's participation in the federal government cooperative education program.

ON THE SECOND segment of this edition of "The Job Show," Thomas A. Lackey, chairman of the math and science departments at the Lawrence Institute of Technology in Southfield presents an overview of careers in the computer science field.

Lackey details the variety of jobs that fall under the heading of computer science and the outlook for each of the specialties.
