Residential Window Film

WHAT IT'S ALL ABOUT

Solar window films were originally designed for heat and glare control and, in many cases, the use of such an application meant comfort and energy savings.

Today, consumers are spending more and more time in the home and investing great amounts of money in furnishings. To protect the furniture, carpeting, art objects, etc., they are utilizing window film, which absorbs nearly all of the sun's damaging ultraviolet rays that damage the home's interior.

Window film has been designed and refined to such a point of sophistication that it is practically invisible. In fact, the false protection of the film neither alters the appearance of a window's visibility, nor distorts the original clear view.

Tinted windows, contrary to belief, do not have to be dark to be effective. In fact, the newest films offer high visibility and high energy control. An example of a recent innovation—and the biggest seller in the glass industry—is the Low-E (low emissivity) film, which helps the glass retain or hold in more heat in the winter.

In addition to protecting home furnishings and dramatically cutting down on the sun's glare, another important benefit from using window film is its ability to make the glass safe (or "breakable"). Should the window break, the film will actually hold broken glass together, offering safety and security. For much more information to break it, they are much less likely to suffer any type of shattered with dangerous glass shards. Special "extra-thick" security films are also available.

In the past, one of the drawbacks of using window film was its tendency to become scratched when cleaned. Today, however, all films boast a scratch-resistant coating which is tough enough to stand up against even fine steel wool.
