greens, and yellow with a green cast. Beyond that, it is more important to recognize that color will minimize the perception of size more effectively when it is either combined with certain other colors, or with particular types of patterns and styles. You may want to consider wearing dresses with small-scale, all-over patterns, in either geometric or floral motifs. This approach gives you the opportunity to wear the brighter colors you should not wear in solids, because the intensity of color is broken up in small designs. The same principle applies to suits and dresses in small-scale woven patterns.

The little black or dark-colored dress with a single color accent at the neckline or hem is also effective.

A more flamboyant option is wearing a two-piece, jacketed dress or suit with a strong pattern in the jacket, and a coordinated solid color in the skirt or dress. You would look well in the red and black pattern and solid coordinates being shown this

Q: I am a 30-year-old divorcee whose social life revolves around giving dinner parties, often to important business associates. I've been quite successful in coordinating my apartment except for the table-top settings. The broad selection of patterns and styles confuses me, and I'm not sure to what extent it has to coordinate with the rest of the apartment, which is furnished in transitional style, using manue, beige, and white, with touches of green. Can you give my any suggestions?

A: Given your circumstances as a single professional, I would go all the way with a very formal and dramatic setting for these reasons. First, a beautifully executed table setting bolsters your overall image and conveys that you are to be taken seriously — a message that won't be lost on your business associates. Second, this type of setting indiges you and your own self-esteem, even when you will be dising alone.

And third, the transitional styles, because of their usual simplicity, more often than not require an accent that a fully accessorized, for-mal setting will certainly provide. Your furnishings allow you a wide range of colors to choose from. Just avoid yellow-greens (chartreuse) and purple because these colors have an uniavorable appeal related to food and the appetite.

From the many fine dinnerware patterns available, the recently introduced Christian Dior line with an occlot and patm tree motif in black and gold, could be appropriate because it blends formality, and elegance with a sophisticated whimsey.
