critical. Of particular importance is what museum director Samuel Sachs II points out as an environmentally safe "envelope" needed to provide the museum with the best regulated temperature and humidity control to protect the art collection.

THE CLIMATE control and mechanical plant are high priority items. Portions of the original 1927 building also need repair, including restoration of the Great Hall and auditorium.

Consideration is also being given a clear, legible circulation pattern through the museum along the north-south and east-west axes as well as vertical connections between main and ground floors at critical locations.

With the necessary public support, an expanded facility for the Detroit Institute of Arts will extend the cultural climate of metropolitan Detroit and Michigan into the 21st century. It will perpetuate the international stature of the museum.

Dale Northrup is a college professor and architectural historian.

Overhead view of the Detroit Institute of Arts master plan model shows the expansion as indicated by perforated lines.

The model view from the southeast shows the proposed Cultural Gardens and the east addition to the museum. The block-like structure in the foreground is the Scarab Club with John R Street behind it.
