Answering systems drive her crazy

Q: Telephones drive me crazy. They cause constant interruptions. I have to hold during long, boring recorded messages, and now we have to dial our own area code on many calls. Help!

A: It's amazing how something so wonderful as a telephone can become a curse as well. For consumers, the trend toward commercial telephone answering systems causes stress and delays. There's little individuals can do to fight this trend, but businesses can learn to facilitate telephone use.

Ironically, as I began gathering research for this article I was immediately thwarted by telephone answering systems and/or unhelpful personnel who encouraged me to leave a message for others to return my call later.

Too often, companies buy equipment for their features and technical merit rather than their ability to route calls to reach a "body" quickly. One of the biggest mistakes businesses make when installing systems is "voice mail" as one communications expert told me. This is where the caller is routed to leave a message without an option to get back to another extension. Good systems allow you to leave a message and then still dial back to another extension afterward.

Many recorded greetings can be cut off midway by pressing a known extension number or "0".

for an operator. This is particularly helpful when you would otherwise be forced to listen to a monotonous listing of choices. It's worth a try to just hit "0" immediately.

To avoid switchboards, ask business people you call frequently if they have a direct number. One company recently installed direct numbers after their recorded answers proved unpopular. When asked about tips on message systems, one of those employees reacted, "Tell 'em to unplug and burn the darn things."

Executives should periodically call their own companies so that they'll understand how customers are treated, and customers should tell executives how they feel they receive poor telephone treatment. I recently called an 800 number advertised by my bank and, after a lengthy explanation of my needs, a whiny voice inquired "Oh, do you want to talk to your bank?" I was not impressed and their executive was amazed when I told him.

While there are pros and cons both ways, my own feeling is that communications people have done a whole of a sales job by convincing companies that commercial systems are less expensive and more efficient than human operators. What they overlook, however, is the loss of personal contact and the resulting good public relations established by helpful human.

More on telephones next week.
