

NON-STOP ENDURANCE RUN
A non-stop endurance run the equivalent of half way around the world with wide open throttle, and three times normal load is obviously a punishing test for any motor, yet that is exactly what happened to a Ford motor recently in the Ford Motor Company Highland Park plant. Although the test was arranged primarily to test a new formula for use in a new model of the motor, it produced results which were most interesting, from the standpoint of engine performance.

Except for the experimental part being tested, the motor was stock, having been picked at random from the motor assembly line. Thus equipped, the motor was coupled to a dynamometer and started.

Inasmuch as the trial was devised to wear out the experimental part, all the punishment the motor would withstand under normal conditions was intensified. With throttle wide open, the motor was made to carry a load about three times as great as that borne by the car under normal conditions. Cooling was purposely retarded so that the radiator at all times registered a boiling temperature and the exhaust pipes were constantly red hot.

For seventeen days and nights the motor roared, while Ford engineers awaited the inevitable result. Not to allow any respite from the intense heat, even the oil was changed on the run, the speed was not varied from 36 miles per hour and the load was at no time reduced. At the end of 412 hours of this grueling punishment, the motor was stopped and disassembled for inspection.

Examination disclosed that the part to be tested had been burned by the terrific heat. But aside from the experimental part, the motor was practically unaffected and apparently ready to repeat its performance.

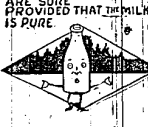

Some of the results of the experiment are as interesting to the automobile owner as to the automotive engineer. During the test, the motor ran the equivalent of 14,632 miles and 793 gallons of gasoline were consumed. The average consumption 18 1/2 miles to the gallon notwithstanding the overload and excessive heat. Those fond of figures may be interested in the fact that in the course of the test, each piston moved up and down in its cylinder approximately 37,080,000 times and the crankshaft made an equal number of complete revolutions. Incidentally, each piston moved a distance of 4,618 miles, during the trial, or 18,472 miles for the four of them.
