NOT WANTED
A few brief months ago when Mark T. McKee was cutting some swath up and down the state as a political figure and as a friend of the administration he was frequently spoken of as the "Detroit Millionaire" by the newspapers of that city. He is now mentioned as Mark McKee of Mt. Clemens. It is quite probable Mr. McKee will join Mr. Welch in conspicuous absence from the rotarum when Governor Groesbeck talks to the voters on state affairs.

OWN YOUR OWN HOME
We are in the midst of a great national prosperity, perhaps as great as we have ever known. It is doubtful if there has ever been a period in our history when economical conditions have been more favorable for the average citizen to own his own home. We should take advantage of this opportunity, for the home-owner presents the greatest safety in citizenship a nation can have. It is upon the foundation of our homes that we build our national progress, and the fact that we have more home owners than anywhere else in the world is due in part our present place among the nations of the earth. Everybody of worthwhile importance realizes this fact, and it is noticeable that men of means are making it possible, through the banks, building and loan associations and other agencies, for the worker to have a castle of his own, within whose portals he is secure from the onslaughts of the world and where he may be able to gird himself each day for the battles of life. The home encourages religion, thrift, decency, courage, ambition; it protects the young from evil influences and preserves a haven of rest and solace for those who have grown old in the service of their community. Resolve this day to plan for that sanctuary which will mean so much, not only to yourself, but to your loved ones that will follow after.

OVERHEAD LIGHTING IN THE LIVING ROOM
In planning proper illumination for the home, the use of wall brackets in conjunction with overhead lighting deserves careful consideration on the part of the home builder. This is a problem to be considered first from the standpoint of correct lighting, and secondly from the standpoint of decoration.
Leading interior decorators quite generally during the past few seasons have endorsed the use of wall brackets because of their decorative value. In some cases plans have been tried using only wall brackets and eliminating entirely the ceiling light. Such plans, however, have not been proved satisfactory from an illuminating standpoint.
It has been found that for ordinary use, wall brackets and floor lamps may be made to supply fairly satisfactory illumination but on many occasions sufficient light cannot be obtained unless an exceptionally large number of wall brackets is used. Even when wall lights are used in large numbers, the casting of shadows is found to give an unsatisfactory effect which can be corrected only by the additional use of overhead lighting.
In planning the home, this is of particular importance because once the house is completed without the necessary wiring for ceiling lighting in the living room or dining room, the expense of installing wiring for overhead equipment later may prove quite costly.
While the home is being constructed, ceiling lights can be provided for at comparatively small expense. After the upstairs floors are laid, however, additional wiring for the downstairs rooms becomes a difficult problem, involving considerable expense. This is particularly important when hardwood floors are used upstairs, for usually a short stop, Wm. Slingerland; r. f.

part of the flooring must be removed in order to install the wiring.
The use of wall brackets only and the elimination of overhead lighting is now considered an extreme to which the average home builder is hardly safe in going. Where it is desired to experiment with this idea, the safest course to follow is to provide wiring for overhead lighting with a concealed outlet at the time the home is being constructed. In this way it is possible to conveniently install overhead equipment at a later date without a large amount of wiring expense and without the inconvenience of having workmen alter the floors for wiring.
From experience it has been found that the ideal combination from the standpoints of both illumination and decoration for the living room and dining room is the use of overhead lighting in addition to wall brackets. The present tendency is strongly in this direction.
