are essential to civilization. They are in demand more each year for recreation and the restoration of health. Woods, fresh air and exercise in the open bind up the lagged sleeve of care better than medicine. It is Nature's prescription, says the New York State College of Forestry, Syracuse University.

The forests furnish employment for one million three hundred and fifty thousand persons. They supply wages annually amounting to approximately one billion four hundred million dollars. These industries represent an investment of twelve billion dollars. In value of output this industry ranks third in the United States. But the forests stand second to none as an essential resource of prosperity and civilization.

The universal importance of the forest imposes upon each person the duty to conserve and protect the forests. The chief factor in forest conservation is fire prevention. Fire is the great destroyer. Forest fires are due almost entirely to human carelessness and therefore may be almost entirely prevented by the exercise of due care which means the observance of good forest manners.

When we are in the forests we should not try to prove that intelligence and decent citizenship is a cloak that can be thrown off. We do not burn our homes, our offices, our personal property. We go to the assistance of him whose home is burning. We do all we can to prevent such fires. This is because we appreciate the necessity for co-operation, assistance and protection, in preserving the home and office. There is, so far as fire is concerned, no difference between saving the home and office in finished lumber and the same lumber before it is finished or as it grows in the forest. If it burns it is your loss because the next time you pay for a home or office, or pay rent the costs are going to be just that much higher because of the reduced supply of construction material. Your home and office are insured—they can be rebuilt. How much worse is it to burn the forest that is not insured and which can not be rebuilt in your time?

Forest fires often destroy the forest soil so trees can not be grown on burned-over areas for hundreds of years. Forest fires exterminate wild life including birds. Birds are of vital importance to successful agriculture. Forest fires cause springs, brooks, and rivers to dry up thus killing all fish and game. The forest is the chief source of pure drinking water and water for the dairy and agricultural land. The forest is part of the National defense.

For all these reasons the forest should receive even better protection than the structures erected by the hand of man. It is important to each person that this national resource be relieved from the terrible annual devastation caused by human carelessness. It would cost 300 million dollars and require 300 years at our present rate of planting to reforest the area burned over in 1924.
