THE IMPORTANCE OF A GOOD Environment

At regular intervals, the old controversy always breaks out as to whether environment or ancestry plays the biggest part in making a man what he is.

Perhaps it will never be settled to everyone's satisfaction just which is more important—the neighborhood in which a child is reared or the characteristics the infant inherits from his parents.

But everyone is agreed that both these elements are highly important. That's why intelligent parents, when planning a suburban home near Detroit, are careful to choose a town with a reputation for neighborliness and clean, community growth.

It is to advertise Farmington's truly American characteristics, its freedom from factory elements and its wholesome home-like atmosphere that the Greater Farmington Association has been formed.
