Thresher Sharks

Thresher sharks are fairly common during the summer around Cornwall, England, where they do great damage to pilchard and mackerel nets, in which they completely wind themselves, like a caterpillar in his chrysalis. The thresher shark is also called the sea fox, from the remarkable tail which he uses to frighten shoals of fish, and so make them more easily caught. There are sailors' yarns that this whiplike tail is sometimes used for flogging whales to death. But the real persecutor of the whale is the gladiator dolphin or sword grampus (Delphinus gladiator), a very carnivorous fellow, who kills and eats whales, seals, and even his brother porpoises.

Device Detects Coal Gases

Gases that kill men in coal mines are so hard to detect—being colorless and odorless—that devices of warning are necessary. A new type lamp has been developed in Europe that, when carried into a dangerous atmosphere, illuminates a small electric light and sounds an electric buzzer.

NOT "OLD STYLE"

"She works for a printing firm you say?"

"Yes."

"What type girl is she?"

"Light on Ancient Vanity"

Two face powder boxes dating back to the Han dynasty, which held sway over China and Korea from 200 B. C. to 220 A. D., have recently come to light in a grave near the city of Peking, in northeast Korea. The archeological remains found in the three graves at this site, according to reports received at the Peking National university, are expected to shed further light on the civilization of this period. The box which proved to be the most interesting of the objects unearthed was about a foot wide and contained a variety of smaller boxes and a curiously shaped flat cup, whose function is unknown. There was, however, no doubt about the vanity cases. There was the powder still in them and still white in spite of the passage of centuries.

Seen in the Moon

A lunar landscape would contrast strikingly with one on the earth, it is indicated by a writer in L'Illustration, Paris. Owing to the absence of atmosphere, the distances would be visually shortened, the sky would be black and the shadows very dark, though reflected light, especially from the earth, would be intense. Idealistic views frequently show a lunar landscape as a surface twisted and bored with crater-form excavations, as if torn by a bombardment of high-explosive shells, and dominated by peaks. All this beneath a glaring light, with a perfectly black sky overhead in which stars sparkle despite the presence of the sun during the lunar day.
