Questions should be sent to the Community Commission on Drug Abuse, P.O. Box 48151, Livonia, Mich. 48151.

Q. Your column a while ago had something to do with marijuana's effect on driving. Does it ever have any effects on people's studies or work in general?

A. There is a recent study that throws some light on this. Subjects were divided into two groups. One group was given "joints" containing a precise amount of the active ingredient in marijuana (THC). The other group was given simulated "joints" containing no drug at all.

It was arranged so that neither the subjects nor those conducting the test knew which cigarettes contained the drug. Tests of mental and physical response were then conducted. For those subjects using the "real thing," both written test scores and physical response to stimuli were reduced in every instance due to the effect of the marijuana.

It should be kept in mind that this test is not the final word on the subject. Rather, it is one of many tests being conducted from studies or work. In effect marijuana, for a number of people, becomes an end in itself, while the real challenges of one's life are put aside.

Q. Is marijuana fattening? Are there any calories in it?
 L.J.S., Livonia

A. First of all, there are absolutely no calories in marijuana. But oddly enough it may be fattening - at least for some people.

In a recent test, alcohol, an amphetamine and marijuana substance were put into a flavored, non-caloric drink. Those subjects given the drink containing amphetamine had a marked loss of appetite and food intake. Those who received the alcohol-containing drink experienced a lesser degree of appetite and food intake. Finally, for those who had taken the marijuana beverage had, in more than half of the cases, total food intake and appetite were noticeably increased.

This leads to a few comments that should be made for the reader's benefit:
 1) Loss of weight or being underweight is a medical problem and should be so treated. Use of marijuana as an excuse to gain weight is not justified because it is too unpredictable and because it may mask an underlying reason for lack of appetite which needs medical treatment.

2) Alcohol does contain calories - in abundance. A possible reason for the slight loss of appetite may be explained by the fact that alcohol provides the most rapidly absorbed source of calories. Notwithstanding so-called diets such as "the drinking man's diet," alcohol over a period of time is as destructive of the effects of dieting as are banana splits.

3) The fact that the amphetamine decreased appetite and food intake should not indicate that one who is overweight should use this drug. There is more and more disenchantment arising about the use of amphetamines even under medical supervision.

Physicians are screening patients in general much more closely before using these drugs for weight control, and some physicians refuse to prescribe them at all. The most common reason for this is that the effects of amphetamines on appetite is really effective only for a few weeks in general. After this the patient may need the drug just to keep even.

Another reason is that amphetamines can become habituating, especially for those who take them in quantities larger than prescribed.

The search for answers for our problems through chemicals is in this case, as in so many others, not always the best way.
