

Community TV's diversity appeals to photographers

CABLE CONNECTION

LARK SAMOUELIAN

Two Farmington Hills residents, Dick Gove and Dave Turnquist, are making a personal commitment to community television. They find themselves increasingly delighted with the diversity in this medium, as they both are still photographers, who used to be anti-video. They felt you cannot capture a moment in time, and, therefore, the artistic quality of a video does not lend itself to the same values.

Dick Gove, however, stated that once he became involved with television, he became aware of the high priority that communicating through a television channel has. He feels especially that television exposure is good for kids, and looks forward to producing shows that enhance high school activities, as well as emphasizing the importance of being involved. Dick thinks we should give our children every opportunity "... to celebrate their hour in the sun."

One of the things community access does is to give adults the opportunity to blend multi-media, which is a unique creative challenge, as well as building self-esteem.
